At a distance of forty years from Identità italiana, the important exhibition curated by Germano Celant in Centre Pompidou, Villa Arson has now become the temporary theatre – for the French and international art audience – of the most recent Italian artistic scene: from the generation that emerged in the 1990s to that of today. The characteristic common to the twenty artists (or artistic groups) in the exhibition is not the confirmation of a cultural belonging, nor is it the effect of the – more or less slow – sedimentation of a time that has developed through continuity. It is rather a temporal fracture, a missed encounter with history, a sort of social and cultural trauma.

This kind of artistic scene is defined by the disorientation caused by the official cancellation of the revolutionary and creative wave of the 1970s and the need to permit the emergence (if not the recovery) of that which had been removed by the ideological and neo-liberal reactions which began in the 1980s.

The exhibition, beginning with its very title The Future Behind Us, explicitly refers to a little explored image of the contemporary Italian artistic scene: that marked by an anachronism, by a basic gap that sees a great anticipatory emancipation such as that expressed by the social forces of the 1970s. As a consequence, the view that this exhibition displays is two-fold and upside down. The temporal fracture becomes the space of an appointment and an encounter with the past – a past that none of the participating artists has lived in person but to which they intend to be witnesses. Bringing together under a common denominator that which three generations of artists have produced is anything but easy in the light of the Cultural dispersion that this scene has suffered over the past few years.

The exhibition itinerary opens, not by chance, with a well-known work by Luca Vitone, Carta Atopica created in 1992. This is a choral response to the fundamental impossibility of orientation that is equal to the historic-social Italian situation of the time. We can read in this map orographic emergencies, water basins, the irregularities of the terrain, the urban conglomerates and isolated hamlets. These signs are admittedly the recording of traces, but of silent traces that cannot be decodified, making it impossible to decipher where we really find ourselves. It is no exaggeration to claim that, in Carta Atopica, this (historic and ontological) uprootedness that characterises not only the artistic generation of the 1990s but also the subsequent ones, is on display in its entirety.

The crises of both the subject and toponymy, recorded within the exhibition, allow the pramacy of the context to emerge, only in the forbidden images of the disruption of the 1970s, which is able to find plural and available modelling for reading and interpreting contemporaneity. A condition of being heirs without a direct inheritance. So, in the rooms, we encounter the themes and repositioning of key figures in that decade who introduced new ways of thinking, of saying, of being: from Franco Basaglia's psychiatric subversive reforms (Stefano Graziani) to Carla Lonzi with her feminist theories (Claire Fontaine and Chiara Fumai), from the anarchist Pinelli (Francesco Arena) to the sexual liberation group Fuori (Irene Dionisio), from Nanni Balestrini (Danilo Correale and Claire Fontaine) and Gruppo '63 (Luca Vitone) to Alberto Griffi's radical cinema (Alice Guareschi), to the more political Enzo Mari (Céline Condorelli) to the conceptual composer Giuseppe Chiarri (Massimo Bartolini), from the members of Autonomia (Rossella Biscotti) to the founders of the Centre for theatrical experimentation and research in Pontedera (Rà di Martino). This section of a more archaeological development in parallel with the emergence – from the urbanistics, ecology and media-activists, in parallel with the anti-globalisation movement.

The whole exhibition, that follows a thematic development in parallel with the emergence – from the 1990s and on an international scale – of the Italian Radical Thought of Paolo Virno, Giorgio Agamben, Maurizio Lazzarato, Silvia Federici, Antonio Negri, Christian Marazzi and Franco Berardi Bifo, in its setting between the 1970s and the present and situating itself in France, offers the opportunity of returning to the fundamental exchanges between the Italian cultural scene and the French one with Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze and Felix Guattari, amongst others.

Deprived of a pre-established repertoire of potential acts, the generation of artists present in the exhibition is destined to seek out new spatial-temporal coordinates through the production of subjective and conceptual maps, the recording of collective events, urban perambulations, spatial modelling and the claims against the gender matrix of the built environment.

We Still Want Everything (Alterazioni Video, Bert Theis, Paolo Cirio, Stalker), where, if there is some form of recovery at play, it is precisely that of the practices in the areas of urbanistics, ecology and media-activists, in parallel with the anti-globalisation movement.

Exhibition realized in collaboration with the MAMAC (Museum of Modern Art and Contemporary Art of Nice) which presents "Vita Nuova. New challenges for art in Italy 1960 - 1975 ". Curated by Valerie Da Costa. Until October 2, 2022.
